Located at the centre of a hundred-year-old native cypress and coihue forest, this 710m² (7,642.38 ft²) house is organized in three stories entirely covered –both the exterior and interior– with autochthonous materials (cypress wood and stone). The house, at the most 8 years old, is built in accordance to the highest construction standards and with an ideal construction quality, with every door and window made with double panel insulated glass, and with slate ceilings that allow the accumulated snow to slide off.

To the left of the living room we find a cosy dining room suited to entertain 16 guests, and to the right we see a cypress wood-coated library that is accessed through a lenga wood sliding door.

All of these rooms have stationed cypress hardwood flooring. The dining room leads us to a spacious kitchen with a dining area, which has polished stone counters, lenga furniture, wood cook stove, gas and electric stove, high ceilings and wooden beams. We access the deck through a door.

The distribution hall also accesses another smaller hall that leads to the bedroom area located on the inferior level, where we find two bedroom suites with ceilings, cypress floors and beams, lenga closets that access the yard through window doors.
